THE PRINCE IN IRELAND.

The presence of the Prince of Wales in Ireland does not seem to have had a very soothing effect upon the rank and file of the Irish people. The Irish would be wholly wanting in that common heritage, human nature, had they given the Prince the sort of a reception he had hoped for. Although the Municipal authorities seemed to have strained every nerve to make his reception the occasion of a popular demonstration, it amounted to little more than outside display, cut and dried to order, and calls forcibly to mind the plan adopted by a California politician years ago. He painted a large canvas with the inscription, "Welcome to our Mountain Home," and caused a man to go ahead and spread it across the main street of the town where he was billed to speak, and when he rode under it he always looked up to the canvas in a puzzled sort of way, as if he had seen it for the first time.

So it was in Ireland, the welcoming of the Prince was a cut and dried Government affair, and he did not get the real sentiment of the people until the air became thick with brick bats and the blood of the Constabulary began to trickle among the cobble stones of the streets.

The Prince is liable at any time to succeed his grasping mother as the Ruler of England, and unless he mitigates the present methods of governing Ireland, the Irish people will indeed be in a deplorable condition.

It is stated that he was really anxious to win the love of the Irish people, and he so far has done nothing toward it, except to state that the huts in which the people lived were a disgrace to humanity. That is just what everybody has been saying all along, but a mere mention of the fact does not stop the leaks in the roof or restore pure atmosphere where there is at present nothing but pestilential odors. The millions squandered by this royal rake in indolence and vice would go a long way toward alleviating the evils which so shocked him in Ireland. The Prince has had about the easiest time that a man of unlimited means and credit could have in luxurious London.

Through hereditary means he has been the pet of some millions of people, who sweat and toil to keep him in idleness and pay his unlimited debts. The Irish contrasting the poverty and misery of their own country, which is everlastingly being bled to support him and his family in costly state, simply look upon him as a whelpage from the Royal kennel, and are only restrained from actual violence by a native gallantry which is inspired by the presence of his estimable wife, who seems to be possessed with all the graces, virtues and noble heartedness, the absence of which in the Prince makes him so generally despised.

Secretary Lamar is now charged with telegraphing postmasters for the return of letters addressed to the agents of the department by his predecessor, which had not yet been delivered. If this is true it is a most remarkable piece of imprudence as well as impudence. Any postmaster, who knows his duty, would pay no more attention to a telegram from the Postmaster General directing a different disposition of letters than that indicated by the superscription, than if it had come from a tramp. Secretary Lamar has no doubt a high appreciation of his power and authority, but it may be he has over estimated both in the matter. If any postmaster has obeyed this order he ought to be dismissed immediately.

The theft of a ballot box after the recent Chicago election is a fresh example of the danger of the electoral system in practice there. Experience goes to show that the New York plan of a single count and immediate destruction of the ballots is the best. That plan had a severe trial in the last Presidential election, and the result vindicated its wisdom. The old system of preserving and recounting the ballots has led to many frauds.
